MANAGEMENT POLICY

April was a difficult month for equity and bond markets. The combination of US inflation data and Q1 US GDP which, while at first sight weak, showed resilient private demand and fuelled market fears that central banks may not ease monetary policy as quickly as hoped.

Valuations were thus under pressure from rising bond yields. The economic backdrop remains supportive of corporate earnings and the first quarter earnings season saw companies exceed expectations by a wide margin, albeit at a low level. However, markets have been more inclined than usual to punish companies that have missed the estimates, as investors seek to determine whether earnings warranted valuation expansion over the past six months.

The strategy posted its first monthly decline in 5 months. At a sectoral level, the technology sector contributed the most to the underperformance, with in particular the declines of Microsoft and NVIDIA which experienced profit taking after the respective increases of 12% and 82% at the end of March. The consumer discretionary sector had a difficult month, with Home Depot in particular losing ground due to concerns that a rebound in manufacturing prices would affect retailers of equipment and furniture. Finally, the financial sector also ended the month on a negative note with the sharp drop of MSCI Inc, hit by quarterly results that were below expectations.
